Week ending October 17, 2025

The S&P 500, currently on a six-month rally, posted a positive yet volatile week following the prior Friday's selloff. The US equity benchmark may be showing signs of short-term fatigue with headwinds arising from ongoing U.S.-China trade tensions, the U.S. government shutdown, and emerging concerns about small regional banks' credit quality. Volatility recently increased, as indicated by the recent spike in the VIX index and a shift toward safe-haven assets, like U.S. Treasuries. Despite these challenges, any market pullback we may experience is not expected to become a deep/prolonged bear market, given supportive factors such as anticipated Federal Reserve rate cuts, strong, positive corporate earnings, and accommodative fiscal policies. Despite the increased volatility of recent weeks, the S&P 500 held above its 50-day moving average, and major U.S. banks kicked off earnings season with strong results, which are potentially bullish signals. Treasury yields fell midweek, with the 2- and 10-year rates breaking below key resistance levels, but rebounded before week's end, reflecting ongoing uncertainty. Oil prices dropped to their lowest levels since May, while gold surged to a new high and Bitcoin experienced a sharp sell-off.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- Treasury yields fell across the curve, driven by a flight to safety amid heightened uncertainty. The 10-year Treasury yield briefly dipped below 4% for the first time since April, then rebounded above this key level to end the week. The 2-year Treasury yield hit its lowest level since 2022, reflecting increased market caution.
- Expectations for Federal Reserve rate cuts in 2025 and 2026 increased, supported by dovish comments from Fed Chair Powell.
- The government shutdown restricted economic data releases, but the Atlanta Fed's GDPNow tracker revised Q3 GDP growth up to +3.9%.
- Credit concerns emerged following losses and lawsuits at certain regional banks, but default rates remain low and banks are well-capitalized.

Equity Markets Overview

- All three major US indices were up for the week. The Nasdaq led with a 2.1% gain, followed by the S&P 500's 1.7% and Dow Jones' 1.6%.
- Q3 earnings season began with major banks beating expectations on both revenue and profit. Of companies that have reported so far 70% of companies beat revenue expectations, while 84% beat on profit expectations. Revenue growth for reporting companies was nearly 8%, and EPS growth almost 16%.
- Market breadth contracted as volatility has ticked up, suggesting last week's gains were driven primarily by larger companies. Speculative and momentum-driven stocks corrected off recent highs, signaling a healthy sentiment reset.
- Trade tensions eased slightly after President Trump suggested high tariffs on China were unsustainable.
- Volatility spiked but reversed by week's end, with the VIX dropping from its Friday intraday high near 29 to close around 22.

Alternative Markets Overview

- Gold futures surged over 5%, marking their ninth consecutive weekly gain bringing its YTD gain to 59.5%. The rally in gold may be tied to both momentum and safe-haven trades.
- Bitcoin prices continued to melt downwards with prices falling 8.7% last week, at one point dropping to its lowest level in three months before a modest rebound.
- Oil prices fell for the third consecutive week, briefly trading below $57 per barrel, as concerns about a global supply glut and rising U.S. inventories outweighed geopolitical risks. The decline was further influenced by news that Presidents Trump and Putin agreed to meet in Hungary to discuss ending the war in Ukraine, which eased fears of tighter energy supplies.

Upcoming Week

- Q3 earnings season is underway and off to a strong start. It is another week loaded with releases, two noteworthy ones include Netflix and Newmont.
- The government shutdown continues and continues to impact government data reporting. This week we will get the last CPI release until it is resolved. We expect to receive some housing data (mortgage applications and existing home sales) as well as the S&P PMI and University of Michigan sentiment updates.
