Week ending February 13, 2026

Capital markets experienced continued volatility last week as a heavy slate of economic data coincided with rising concerns around artificial intelligence driven disruption across multiple sectors. Economic reports were mixed but generally constructive, with strong payroll growth, a decline in the unemployment rate, and cooler-than-expected inflation helping reinforce the view that U.S. fundamentals remain intact. At the same time, weaker December retail sales signaled some late-2025 consumer fatigue following an extended period of above-trend spending. Equity markets sold off, led by mega-cap technology stocks, as investors reacted to AI developments perceived as threats to established business models rather than growth catalysts. This weakness spilled into other sectors including financial services and telecommunications, contributing to broader risk-asset declines. Fixed income markets responded positively to softer inflation data, with Treasury yields falling, particularly longer-term rates, as bond prices rose. Overall, the week reflected a growing tension between solid macroeconomic fundamentals and an increasingly fragile market sentiment driven by volatility and rapid narrative shifts.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- U.S. Treasury prices rose during the week, driving yields lower across the curve following cooler-than-expected inflation data. Treasury bonds benefited from a broader flight toward perceived safe-haven assets amid equity volatility.
- The yield curve flattened, with larger yield declines at the long end relative to the front end. The 10-year Treasury yield fell 18 bps, its largest 1-week decline since September, to end the week at 4.04%, reaching a year-to-date low.
- Softer CPI readings improved investor confidence that inflation is continuing to moderate toward the Federal Reserve's target. Bond markets reacted positively despite acknowledgment that core inflation measures remain somewhat elevated.
- Market expectations for near-term Federal Reserve rate cuts declined following stronger-than-expected labor market data.

Equity Markets Overview

- The 3 major U.S. equity indices declined approximately 1%–2% for the week amid heightened volatility. This marked the 4th week of the last 5 the S&P 500 posted a weekly loss, though this was the first in excess of 1%.
- Despite index declines, market breadth remained resilient, with nearly two-thirds of S&P 500 constituents trading above their 200-day moving averages.
- Mega-cap technology stocks led the sell-off, with the “Magnificent 7” down about 2% for the week. AI-related disruption fears triggered selling beyond technology and impacting several sectors. Defensive equity sectors such as utilities outperformed amid a rotation toward lower-risk exposures.
- Earnings season remained supportive, with a majority of reporting companies exceeding both revenue and earnings expectations.
- Japanese equities were a notable outlier, rallying sharply following an election outcome supportive of fiscal stimulus and growth initiatives.

Alternative Markets Overview

- Bitcoin experienced another volatile week, initially selling off before rebounding following softer inflation data. It ended the week down 1.8% but appeared to find support near its 200-week moving average, a level historically associated with market bottoms.
- Gold prices were volatile but finished last week up just over 1%. The precious metal's price rebounded sharply after a midweek selloff as softer-than-expected U.S. inflation data revived hopes for Federal Reserve rate cuts, prompting dip-buying
- Oil markets were broadly stable but ended the week slightly lower, with Brent and WTI crude holding near recent levels after sharp midweek losses, as investors balanced signs of easing U.S. inflation against concerns that OPEC+ may resume production increases, leaving both benchmarks with modest weekly declines.
