Week ending February 27, 2026

Elevated market volatility persisted last week as sentiment was pressured by continued tariff uncertainty, AI-related disruption concerns, and renewed anxiety around private credit. U.S. equities traded in a choppy, sideways pattern, with major indices finishing modestly lower despite generally strong earnings results and a healthy macro backdrop. Inflation fears resurfaced after a hotter than expected Producer Price Index report. The second upward surprise in inflation reports, with PCE topping forecasts last week, raised concerns that price pressures may be re-accelerating. At the same time, safe-haven demand drove a rally in Treasuries, pushing the 10-year yield below the key 4% threshold by week's end. AI remained a dominant theme, with strong earnings from NVIDIA confirming robust infrastructure demand, though the stock sold off as investors questioned the pace and returns of AI spending. Software stocks showed signs of stabilization late in the week following earnings from Salesforce and Snowflake. Overall, markets reflected elevated uncertainty rather than deteriorating fundamentals, with volatility remaining high and leadership continuing to rotate across sectors. Please note, all perspective is as of February 27th's close. Details on the Iran Conflict from the weekend and this week will be covered next week.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- U.S. Treasury yields fell across the curve as investors sought safety amid geopolitical, AI, and private credit concerns. The yield curve flattened modestly, with intermediate and long-dated yields falling more than short rates.
- The 10-year Treasury yield dropped below 4.0%, reaching its lowest level since October 2025 when markets were negotiating the Federal government shutdown, weakening labor market data, and expectations for Fed rate cuts.
- Market expectations for Fed rate cuts in 2026 remained largely unchanged, with only minor shifts in near-term probabilities.
