Week ending May 22, 2026

US markets posted their eighth consecutive weekly gain, marking the longest winning streak since December 2023. The S&P 500 rose 0.9% driven by continued enthusiasm for artificial intelligence and progress in Middle East peace negotiations fueling optimism and offsetting persistent inflation concerns. Treasury yields movements were mixed during the week, with the 2-year yield rising while the 10-year and 30-year yields declined, as markets repriced Federal Reserve policy expectations amid stronger macroeconomic data. WTI crude oil fell 8.4% to $96.60 per barrel as momentum built around Iran peace talks, while gold declined 0.9% pressured by elevated oil prices, rising yields, and a stronger dollar. Consumer sentiment plunged to a record low of 44.8 in May, down from 49.8 in April, as consumers cited high prices as eroding their finances. Initial jobless claims came in at 209,000 for the week ending May 21, indicating labor market resilience despite mounting consumer anxiety over gasoline prices and the ongoing Middle East conflict. Markets navigated a complex environment where strong corporate earnings and AI enthusiasm supported equities even as inflation concerns and geopolitical uncertainty weighed on consumer confidence and bond markets.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- The yield curve flattened during the week, with the front end rising while longer-dated maturities declined as markets repriced Federal Reserve policy expectations.
- The 2-year Treasury yield increased 4 basis points to 4.18%, the 10-year Treasury yield decreased 3 basis points to 4.56%, and the 30-year Treasury yield decreased 5 basis points to 5.07%.
- The rise in yields since late April reflected markets adjusting to stronger US macroeconomic data, indicating a macroeconomic repricing rather than investor selling flows.
- Market odds shifted decisively toward a Federal Reserve rate hike this year or early 2027.
- The Fed's GDPNow estimate declined slightly from 4.30% to 4.26% during the week.

Equity Markets Overview

- US equity markets advanced for the eighth consecutive week, with broad-based gains across major indices despite mixed economic signals. The S&P 500 rose 0.9% for the week, the Nasdaq Composite gained 0.5%, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average climbed 2.2%, with the Dow hitting its ninth closing record of 2026.
- A key theme during the week was the resilience of AI-related technology stocks and the rotation into defensive sectors, as investors balanced enthusiasm for artificial intelligence with concerns about inflation and Federal Reserve policy.
- Health Care and Utilities led sector performance with a 3.3% gain each, followed by Real Estate at 3.0%. The weakest performers were Telecommunications with a 1.9% loss and Consumer Staples with a 1% loss.
- The S&P 500 earnings season continued to support market gains, with companies like Ross Stores, Workday, and Zoom Communications reporting stronger profits than analysts expected, keeping stocks near record highs.

Alternative Markets Overview

- WTI crude oil fell 8.4% for the week, ending at $96.60 per barrel, as momentum built around Iran peace talks.
- Gold declined 0.9% for the week, remaining caught between rate hike fears and bond market stress, as it struggled to recover despite risk appetite returning to equity markets.
- Bitcoin fell 4.2% for the week as the 200-day moving average provided resistance, like previous bear markets in May 2018 and March 2022.
- Nasdaq received approval from the SEC to list Bitcoin index options, expanding regulated crypto derivatives offerings and providing US equities traders an alternative way to bet on cryptocurrency prices beyond existing ETF options.
