Week ending June 5, 2026

US equity markets ended the week significantly lower, as a strong May jobs report on Friday triggered a broad selloff driven by rising expectations that the Federal Reserve may raise interest rates later this year. The S&P 500 fell 2.5% for the week as mega-cap technology names that had powered the index to record highs earlier in the week reversed course sharply. Treasury yields rose across the curve, with the front-end leading gains as the stronger-than-expected labor market data reinforced concerns that inflation, already elevated in part due to the ongoing conflict in the Middle East, may prove more persistent. WTI crude oil rose 3.6% on the week, supported by continued disruptions to supply through the Strait of Hormuz. The May Nonfarm Payrolls report showed the U.S. economy added 172,000 jobs—nearly double the consensus estimate of 88,000—while the unemployment rate held steady at 4.3%, marking the strongest three-month advance in hiring in more than two years. Taken together, last week's data painted a picture of a resilient but inflation-pressured economy, leaving investors navigating a more uncertain rate environment just as the AI-driven equity rally showed signs of fatigue.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- The Treasury yield curve flattened modestly, as short-term yields rose more sharply than long-term yields, driven by a significant repricing of Federal Reserve policy expectations.
- The 2-year Treasury yield rose 19 basis points to 4.17%, the 10-year Treasury yield rose 10 basis points to 4.55%, and the 30-year Treasury yield increased 2 basis points to 5.01%.
- The primary driver of the yield move was the May payrolls report, which, together with the Fed's Beige Book released Wednesday—showing inflation rising across most Fed districts, largely tied to energy costs from the Middle East conflict—reinforced concerns that price pressures remain elevated.
- The Fed's GDPNow estimate for Q2 GDP declined over the past week, easing from 3.8% to 3.0%.

Equity Markets Overview

- US equity markets declined over the week, reversing earlier gains as a sharp Friday selloff erased what had been a promising start driven by AI spending optimism. The S&P 500 fell 2.5% for the week, the Nasdaq Composite dropped 4.7%, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average declined 0.2% for the week.
- A key theme was the underperformance in technology stocks, with the Nasdaq posting its worst weekly decline in over a year as the sector absorbed the bulk of the selling pressure. Losses were led by sharp declines in semiconductor names, including Micron (-13.3%) and Nvidia (-6.2%) on Friday alone, which dragged the broader tech complex lower.
- Energy led sector performance with a 2.5% gain, followed by Healthcare with a 2.3% advance, while Consumer Discretionary declined 6.2% and Technology fell 5.4% to rank as the week's worst performers.
- Investor risk appetite deteriorated sharply by week's end, as the prospect of Federal Reserve rate hikes and weakening market breadth combined to reset sentiment from the optimism that had characterized much of the prior two months.

Alternative Markets Overview

- Commodity markets were mixed over the week, with energy prices supported by ongoing geopolitical tensions while precious metals and digital assets sold off decisively in response to the shifting interest rate outlook.
- WTI crude oil rose 3.6% over the week, ending Friday at $90.54 per barrel, as OPEC output fell to its lowest level in at least 37 years driven largely by ongoing disruptions to shipping through the Strait of Hormuz.
- Gold fell 5% over the week, erasing its year-to-date gains, as the stronger-than-expected May jobs report drove bond yields and the US dollar sharply higher, reducing the appeal of the non-yielding metal.
- Bitcoin declined 18% over the week, falling below $60,000 for the first time since October 2024.
